“Good” in Scripture: Hebrew tov, Greek agathos and kalos

Two different words are in play: Hebrew tov in Genesis and Greek agathos in Mark, plus a third Greek word, kalos, that turns out to be the link between them. They overlap heavily but are not interchangeable, and the difference is useful for teaching.

The words

Genesis 1: Hebrew טוֹב (tov)

“God saw that the light was good” (1:4); “it was very good” (1:31, tov me'od). Tov is one of the broadest words in Hebrew. It covers pleasant, beautiful, beneficial, functional, prosperous, and morally good, all in one term. In Genesis 1 the sense is primarily fit for purpose, as it should be, pleasing to its Maker: creation working the way God intended. The same word carries the moral sense in “the tree of the knowledge of good and evil” (2:9, 17).

Mark 10: Greek ἀγαθός (agathos)

“Good teacher… Why do you call me good? No one is good except God alone” (10:17–18; the same word in the Luke 18 parallel). Agathos denotes goodness of nature or character: intrinsic, essential goodness, often with a moral and beneficent edge. This is why Jesus can use it to point at God's very being: agathos is what God is, not merely what He does.

The link: the Septuagint

When the Greek Old Testament (the Septuagint, LXX) translated Genesis 1, it did not use agathos. It used καλός (kalos): “God saw the light, that it was kalon” (1:4); “kala lian”: very good (1:31). Kalos means good in the sense of beautiful, fine, noble, well-made, fitting: goodness as admirable rightness.

Elsewhere the LXX renders tov with agathos (Psalm 73:1, “God is agathos to Israel”) or even chrēstos, “kind” (Psalm 34:8, “taste and see that the Lord is chrēstos”). The translators felt the shades inside the one Hebrew word and chose among Greek words to match.

Word	Language	Core sense	Example
tov	Hebrew	good in every sense: fit, pleasing, beneficial, moral	Gen 1:4, 31; 2:9

Word	Language	Core sense	Example
kalos	Greek	good as beautiful, noble, well-made, fitting	LXX Gen 1; John 10:11 “good shepherd”; Matt 5:16 “good works”
agathos	Greek	good in nature and character: intrinsic, beneficent	Mark 10:18; James 1:17 “every good gift”

Are they equivalent?

Overlapping, not identical. Hebrew tov is wider than either Greek word and covers both of their ranges. Greek makes a distinction Hebrew leaves undivided: kalos leans toward the goodness you see (beauty, fitness, admirable quality); agathos toward the goodness something is (character, essence, benefit). The LXX translators felt that difference and chose kalos for creation (well-made, as it should be) rather than agathos.

So “the heavens and earth were tov” and “no one is agathos but God” are not the same claim wearing two languages. Creation is good as a made thing is good: fit, beautiful, right. God is good as the source is good: in His very nature.

Why this helps Week 1 of the course

This is the Week 1 thesis sitting inside the vocabulary. Creation's goodness (tov / kalos) is derived: a well-made thing reflecting its Maker. God's goodness (agathos) is original: the character everything else borrows from. That is exactly “anything called good is good because it participates in Him.” The two words are not a problem for the claim; they are the claim's grammar.

A way to put it for the class: Genesis 1 says creation is kalos: good the way a masterpiece is good. Mark 10 says only God is agathos: good the way the Artist is good.

One caution for teaching: do not press the kalos / agathos distinction as a rigid rule. The New Testament uses them near-synonymously in places (both describe “good works”), and the LXX is not perfectly consistent. The distinction is a real tendency, not a watertight system; hold it as illumination, not as a proof.
